Abstract
This paper is about foreign African Muslims, particularly Malawian and Senegalese Muslim migrants in Durban, South Africa. Modern 21st century migration processes are a global phenomenon deeply embedded in a complex interaction of social, economic and political patterns and processes, often leading to concentrations and enclaves people in large urban centers, such as Durban, along lines of religious, ethnic or national origins. International migrants from various parts of Africa are equally diverse sets of people in terms of origin, religion, culture, skills, occupations, among other attributes. They have equally diverse sets of expectations in terms of resources, jobs, services and rights to engage in entrepreneurial and other productive activities. Durban itself is also a major urban area in Southern Africa with a significant Muslim population and a centre of Islamic influence reaching out across the sub-continent, and may serve as a point of attraction for African Muslim migrants. Indeed religious identity is an important factor that is imbricated in Malawian and Senegalese Muslims attempts to search for new solutions to their problems of adaptation, integration and assimilation into a new place. A key issue addressed in this paper is whether their identities, particularly religious, ethnic and national identities, provide a set of resources to accommodate themselves and pursue their aims of being gainfully employed as entrepreneurs and workers in a different country. At the end of this paper an attempt is made to evaluate their contribution and influence to Islamic discourse and practice in Durban and South African more generally.

BACKGROUND

Muslims and Islam in South Africa has undergone massive changes since its historical entanglement with racism and inequality ranging from 17th century slavery in the Cape to 19th century colonialism and 20th century segregation and Apartheid in South Africa. Although this engagement was never homogenous, it throws up the question of what is Islam as a minority religion and, more importantly, the contribution Muslims make, as a community, to South Africa. While under colonialism and apartheid the debate was about the Islam’s incompatibility with injustice prompted some to argue for active political opposition by Muslims to an unjust system, while others sought accommodation and political maneuver to create and sustain a moderate Islamic practice. Yet this debate takes on new forms in the post-apartheid period. Given the Constitutional space to practice religion unhindered, many local Muslims in South Africa began to focus on questions of Muslim piety and morality, rather than engage in the larger public debates about the relevance of Islam in times of reconstruction and development. Yet the new wave of Muslims from Africa presents a new and interesting phenomenon that tap into debates about identity, transnationalism, religion and the contribution that migrants make to the economy and society. And as they often come from fragile, collapsing or collapsed states and societies, the issue of the politics of reconstruction and development, often lie at the centre of why they are here and what they do. These are issues which will be discussed through the use of two case studies of African Muslim migrants (though not exclusively), from Senegal and Malawi. In particular the question may be posed as what implications their practices, whether it be economic, social or religious, may have for a constitutional democracy such as South Africa, particularly in a world where the valued principles of tolerance and respect for diversity are under threat.

FACTS, FIGURES AND DIFFERENTIATION: THE CONTEXTS FOR AFRICAN MUSLIM MIGRANTS

There is no doubt that there is a visible increase in continental African and other migrants and immigrants in South Africa, particularly since the early 1990s. This does not mean that there was no previous African or indeed other migration to South Africa. Under Apartheid the tight control of African continental migration, mainly from Malawi, Botswana, and Mozambique, ensured that their singular major contribution to South Africa was their labour, and hence to the growth of an industrial economy. Their public presence was hidden away in the single sex mining compounds and hostels, invisible to the South African public. That system of controlled migrations and exploited labour no longer exists. Some of these forced labour migrants may well have been Muslims, but precisely because they were hidden behind mining compounds, their religion and practices have not been visible and examined. The most visible presence of Muslims were those that cam to South Africa from the Indian subcontinent, Malaysia, and Indonesia as a result of Dutch and British colonial practices in the 17th to 19th centuries. A new wave of Muslim migrants have been arriving in the late 20th and early 21st centuries from different parts of the world, and in particular from Africa.

There are no statistics that are kept on a religious basis to be able to present with any precision what the precise numbers of foreign Muslim migrants are in South Africa. At best we can estimate this from the documented migrants, and making estimates based on the proportion of Muslims that exist in particular countries. While some statistics are kept on documented migration to South Africa on country, gender and occupational basis this does not include refugees and asylum seekers, and of course does not include undocumented migrants.

It would be safe to say that most Muslim migrants, both documented and undocumented, come from countries in Africa where there is a significant, if not a majority, Muslim presence. This would be countries such as Somalia, Sudan, Kenya, Cameroon, Burundi, Tanzania, Malawi, Senegal, Cote d'Ivoire, Nigeria, Ghana, Zimbabwe, Burundi and Rwanda. Muslims also come from Asian countries such as Bangladesh, India, Malaysia, Indonesia, Pakistan and various Middle East countries. A further distinction may also be made between legal immigrants who come to work with a view to permanent residency in South Africa and migrants who find work in South Africa as a necessity, or as part of a contract of employment for specific period of time (Reitzes: 1997, 1998).

Before we analyse the ways in which migrant African Muslim have made their presence felt in South Africa, a brief outline of the contemporary context of migration is necessary.

A number of conditions have been set in motion for these new streams of migration from the rest of Africa to South Africa. The first set of conditions is essentially the push factors in the country or place of origin. Among this first set of push factors is political instability, prompting a stream of refugees. These are mainly from the civil wars and political problems experienced in various parts of Africa, but mainly in the Great Lakes region encompassing the countries of Rwanda, Burundi and the Democratic Republic of Congo, but also from places such as Ethiopia, Somalia, Sudan, Nigeria and Ivory Coast. Unlike other countries, South Africa does not have refugee camps, and so refugees, once they have affirmed their status with the Department of Home Affairs, are left to fend for themselves. They may seek and accept employment or be self-employed within the confines of the law. The refugees, despite their official status, become like migrants – temporary sojourners seeking employment. The second set of conditions is located in the myriad ways in which African economies have collapsed, either through structural adjustment programmes, or through inadequate or corrupt state administration and management, or both, prompting a stream of some people migrating to find new livelihood opportunities. These are economic migrants. Many of these migrants choose to come to South Africa because they have heard or been exposed to the media that portrays it as a powerful economy with plenty of opportunities. For some such migrants, South Africa is their second or third choice of destination after Europe or the United States of America, because of the tightened immigration laws in Europe and restrictive conditions for immigrating to the USA. A third set of conditions is that some migrants simply seek to explore what conditions exist in the new South Africa. The miracle of democratic transition and continuing stability exerts a powerful attraction for African adventurers, professionals and entrepreneurs to seek out opportunities ranging from post-secondary school education, investment and employment opportunities in sectors such as universities, professional services, retail and manufacturing to acting as consultants to industry and government. But it should be noted that xenophobia, limited opportunities, the difficulty of re-starting their lives are at first a horrible shock. Expectations of plenitude, sympathy and solidarity, if present, as is often the case with refugees and migrants generally, are rapidly removed from their consciousness. Many migrants, rather than return empty handed, stay and exploit whatever opportunities do exist. However, such opportunities exist in highly prescribed and socially conceptualised ways. It is in this context that African Muslim migrants must be understood, in particular the different ways in which Senegalese and Malawian Muslims pursued the necessity of making a living and re-constituting their religious and other identities in a country struggling with its own ethnic and racial past and the reconstruction of itself as a new nation.
A number of observations may be made about these facts and figures. The first is that not all migrants are the same and may also be differentiated by their class, religious affiliations, occupational and national origins, which in large measure bear on their ability to insert themselves into the tough economic conditions that prevail in South Africa’s transitional period. For example those from middle and upper class background, regardless of religious affiliation, find it easier to integrate themselves into the South African economy and society as business people, professionals, technicians and academics. The second observation to note is that the African countries from which most migrants arrive do not all have Muslim majorities, but many do have significant numbers of Muslims. It would be misleading to assume that all foreign migrants from these countries with Muslim majorities are indeed Muslim. In the context of this paper, reference is often made to African migrants and to migrants especially from Senegal, Somalia or Malawi. In the case of the first two these countries, they have between 95-100% Muslim population, and thus it is assumed that most, if not all migrants from these countries are Muslim. In Malawi 35% of its 9.5 million people is Muslim, the assumption being that approximately 35% of Malawians living in this country are Muslims. The third observation is that what constitutes a Muslim community in South Africa is now highly ambiguous, and invalidates the foundational myths of apartheid that ‘Muslim’ or ‘Islam’ equates with an eastern religion or Indian as is so often the case in the province of KwaZulu-Natal. The presence of African Muslims from many parts of the continent has begun to undermine this myth. Not only do African Muslim migrants in South Africa undermine an ingrained shibboleth of ethnic and racial stereotypical thinking, they pose a much broader question: given the differentiated and ambiguous nature of the Muslim community, how is Islam, which has hitherto been exoticised and stereotyped in South Africa as an Asian, Eastern or Indian religion, currently articulated and practiced by African migrants.

As a religious category, being Muslim needs to be put in perspective. Membership of the Muslim community – the Umma, i.e. a sense of community united through religion that transcends race, ethnic and national group identities - is a highly contested one world wide. In South Africa it can take many forms of affiliations based on Islamic schools of thought, religious practices and affiliations, ethno-nationality to name but a few. Thus for example, Senegalese Muslims might well disagree with conservative South African Muslims or Malawian Muslims on the status and veneration of their ancestral spiritual leader Sheik Ahmedou Bamba. Furthermore, it cannot be assumed that all Muslims are the same in their religious practices. Apart from ritual and language practices, some might be affiliated and play active roles in Muslim religious and welfare organizations, while there are others to who prefer to be at a distance from organized or institutionalized religion. There might those that like to express their religious zeal in a particular brand of Islamic missionary work in Africa, which African migrants might find patronizing and offensive. Whereas some Muslims might be extremely pious, there are others who are less devout in their religious practices, and yet others who might be non-practicing Muslims. These manifestations raise questions about how to define a Muslim. Would the categories less devout or outwardly pious, or non practicing Muslims, still be regarded as Muslim? There might be some doctrinal or definitional disputes about whether they belong to the Umma, whereas the actors themselves would probably see themselves as Muslims or at the very least think of themselves as Muslims in a cultural sense of belonging to a group.

Muslims are also differentiated along lines of race, class, nationality, and gender. These sociological aspects, albeit intertwined with religious precepts and values, are important in the way African Muslim migrants, as suggested above, structure their relations with the local Muslims (i.e. those of Indian or Malay descent) (one is hesitant to say ‘indigenous Muslims’ because of the connotations the word ‘indigenous’ carries), and among themselves. But religious affiliations, loyalties and influences are never static and are conditioned by circumstances and situations that individuals and groups find themselves in. In the case of African foreign Muslim migrants, as I shall show later, in highlighting their Muslim identity, though not necessarily their particular religious affiliation, piety, or other characteristics, may be crucial to mobilizing and accessing resources – food, shelter, funds, places of worship, sites to conduct rituals – in order to survive in South Africa. Although I have drawn attention to the differentiated ways in which Muslims find themselves, it would be disingenuous to argue that the use of Muslim or Islamic identity by African migrants is no more than a crass tactic to secure the means of livelihood and accommodation only in South Africa. In this sense it would be misleading to discount the importance of the Umma. However, religious ascription, should not deny African Muslim migrants from acting with other foreign migrants (or anyone else for that matter) to gather together as a group based on common concerns as refugees, asylum seekers, or economic migrants, or to seek common cause with the poor, marginalized and disadvantaged in contemporary post-apartheid South Africa.

A final observation is that while there is some emotive political and public debate over African migrants, as ‘aliens’ and ‘illegal’, there is a broader question of what rights and entitlements do such migrants have and how does it inhere into the itineraries, agendas, social and economic interactions and religious practices of the migrants in the social and public spaces in which these are pursued. In a sense they stretch the imagination of what it means to be part of a global economy and society, an Umma of believers of a myriad ethnic, national, cultural and class backgrounds. More specifically in South African is has direct implications of what it means to develop a rights based national culture that is tolerant and respectful of cultural and religious diversity, a point which gives cogent effect to the enshrined constitutional rights to religion, language and culture.

INITIAL INTERACTIONS AND SURVIVAL: ACCOMMODATION AND LIVELIHOOD STRATEGIES OF AFRICAN MIGRANTS.

Continental African migrants do not see themselves as simply one kind of immigrant. Their arrival at a border post is often simplified to satisfy the one-dimensional criterion for the purposes of entry (business, study, work, tourist, asylum seeker or refugee). Many continental African migrants are here as result of complex intertwining of political, economic and sometimes personal reasons for leaving their countries of origin and fleeing thousands of kilometres to the southern tip of Africa. Thus many Senegalese, Nigerian, and Cameroonian migrants say that they are political asylum seekers because of their oppositional role in politics to the previous regimes in their home country, but also they cannot find work, and were forced to leave their country. Others such as Somali, Sudanese, Rwandans state that they are refugees. Asylum seekers may claim to be victims of their political activities, but they also seek refuge from the constraints of a less than robust economy. Others such as the Malawians are forthright in their reasons for coming to South Africa: they come to seek work.

Although asylum seekers and refugees are generally grateful to be accepted into the country, it has been a difficult experience for the first few of them to find accommodation and establish a means of livelihood. Given the paucity of State assistance, they have had to rely on a number of strategies to finding accommodation, various means of survival and employment or self-employment. These strategies are:

1. Identifying and seeking the assistance of people from their own country. Physical features and language being the most common ways of identifying them.
2. Arriving with an address of a friend or relative, which many do, particularly the Congolese, Senegalese and Malawians.
3. Locking into an established network, good examples being the Senegalese and Malawians.
4. Finding their way to church sponsored-refugee centres, such as the Jesuit Refugee Services and Mennonite Refugee Project. These services are for all refugees, but particularly those forced migrants affected by the genocide and continuing conflict in the Great Lakes region of Central Africa (Congo, Burundi, Rwanda), and in East Africa (Somalia, Ethiopia, Sudan). Malawians and Senegalese to my knowledge do not use these services.
5. Muslims migrants such as Malawians from the Mangochi district (where the Yao Muslims predominate), connecting and seeking assistance from Islamic charitable and welfare organizations or mosques has been a major consideration in starting to develop a new life. This also applies to some extent to the early Somali, Rwandese and Burundian refugees and migrants. It should be noted that some refugees and undocumented migrants also pretend to be Muslims in order to get priority attention from Islamic based welfare and charitable organizations.

What are the options for livelihood generation by foreign migrants in South Africa? Often denied access to jobs that they have been trained for in their countries of origin such as teachers, medical personnel, engineers, economists, and technicians of various kinds, most have turned to working for themselves in the informal sector as street traders, car guards, street hair salons, tailors and security guards. Some worked in the retail sector and construction industry as unskilled labourers. This is not to deny that many migrants come to the country without any apparent skills at all, such as some of the Malawians. Unskilled or barely skilled migrants are vulnerable to unscrupulous employers, who make them work under onerous conditions illegally.

The range of occupations mentioned above is not a menu of options, but rather what is available for foreign African migrants. Indeed, except for the security guards, retail and construction sectors, all the other occupations tend to be in the informal sector. Even in this sector, refugees, asylum seekers and undocumented migrants find it difficult to make a living. Until approximately 1984 no one was allowed to engage in informal trade on the streets of the major cities. In Durban this prohibition on itinerant street trading has a long history stretching back to the beginning of the Natal colony, targeting especially local black and Indian hawkers. However, over the last fifteen years informal trading on the streets has become an accepted and tolerated activity. Indeed the by-laws which strictly prevented street trading and hawking were amended, and replaced by a system of issuing permits, or ‘vending licenses’ to trade within clearly demarcated areas on the street. This seemed a progressive step in the light of the fact that the formal economy was, and still is unable to generate sufficient jobs to absorb the unemployed, and provided an alternative to formal employment generation. But its application since the arrival of foreign migrants from other parts of Africa has been less than satisfactory. In the city of Durban foreign migrants have been denied the trading permits on the grounds that they do not have a 13 digit identity number. It just so happens that this 13 digit identity number is one that is issued and used by South Africans. By-laws regarding the issuing of licenses do not discriminate on the basis of South African identity numbers - it merely requires an identity number, which all refugees and asylum seekers have on their "prohibition of Aliens" document or official identity books.

Often the choice of livelihood within the range of options available depends, at least in the initial stages of their stay, on the country of origin, what networks of friends and relatives that they connect with in South Africa, and how long they are prepared to persevere in finding the kind of work they are comfortable with, or prepared to do. Thus one finds that many of the street traders are Senegalese and Somalis (mainly Muslim), whereas the Congolese, Burundians and Rwandans tend towards being car guards on the streets of Durban and security guards for homes, offices, factories and various institutions. Some of them run street hair salons, and engage in tailoring, as do some of the Ghanaians and Cameroonians. Malawians, because of the longer ties that they have with South Africa tend to be able to connect with a well-established network of their own nationals. These networks, which shall be described below, provide them with advice on employment opportunities, or access to South African employers mainly in various retailing, tailoring, dressmaking and clothing manufacturing sectors. Some Malawians have subsequently branched out to work on their own, and create employment.

Using one or a combination of these strategies outlined above to settle the primary requisites of accommodation and their visa conditions (usually with the assistance of one or more of the above mentioned groups, friends or institutions); they are now in a position to seek employment or to become self-employed. It is at this point that the ability to exercise their economic right to employment becomes severely limited. Unable to find employment (as formal employees) because of legal constraints and prevailing prejudices and xenophobic tendencies in the host society many of the migrants resort to one or more broad strategic options. One option is the refugee centre, a church-funded project based in the Durban Ecumenical Centre. Those who have sought assistance from organizations such as the Jesuit Refugee Services (JRS), The Mennonite Refugee Project, and the Japanese Voluntary Committee (JVC) have been mainly, though not exclusively, people from Central Africa, particularly Congolese, Rwandans, and Burundians and Ethiopians. Others such as Somalis have also sought their assistance, but have also been to Muslim organizations such as the South African Zakaat Fund, the Africa Muslim Agency, The International Dawa Movement and Islamic Propagation Centre, as well as mosques and other Muslim welfare agencies. No doubt the traumatic experience of their war-torn countries, their flight to safety, and their lack of resources means initial continued reliance on these welfare organizations. The other option is illustrated by groups like the Senegalese, who make no use of such services for their initial survival prospects. Instead they rely on their own networks and organizational capacities to survive. Malawians make minimal use of welfare organizations initially, but do use them extensively in integrating themselves into South African society and economy.

LOCATION AND LIVELIHOODS

In the main, many continental African foreign migrants are found in city centres because it is the only place where there are better opportunities for making a living and where they have access to resources to ensure a measure of protection. The well connected political elite and upper middle class migrants, among whom there may be Muslims that fled places like Zaire, (now Democratic Republic of Congo) Burundi, Rwanda or Nigeria, were able to easily insert themselves into the South African economy by setting up businesses or as professionals and living in the suburbs (Bouillon, 2001: 48-50). Others such as the refugees from the Great Lakes area and countries such as Somalia, did not have these options. For many of them, even though well educated and professionals such as teachers, nurses, administrators, economists etc, had/have a more difficult time in finding employment. For many of them they have had to resort to street trading, trading in fleamarkets, and for the more entrepreneurial import-export businesses linked to their country of origin. Although many did not find it difficult to adapt to informal trading, as it is a familiar activity, it is necessary to understand that there are different categories of people involved in these activities. Firstly, there are those involved in the import-export business, but who carry out their market selling activities on the streets and fleamarkets of major cities. Many of these people were not traders per se, but through circumstances became street traders. They come, according to Kadima (2001: 102), from a number of different professional fields such as mathematics, engineering, accountancy, and pilots, as well as from the ranks of the asylum seekers, refugees and students who had to earn a living while in South Africa to sustain themselves. Unlike the elite, their residential and living conditions were confined to the densely populated inner cities, partly to find protection and security from the hostility of locals and officials, and partly because of easy access to their trading places in the city. In Johannesburg this means living in places such as Hillbrow, Bertrams, Berea and to a lesser extent Yeoville. In Durban and Cape Town this meant the central business district, to lesser extent in various suburbs. Although for some this avenue of employment has not been successful, others who started modestly become successful at their business, and provide employment for at least two additional persons. But their success, despite the lack of state support for small, micro and medium enterprises of foreign migrants, often attracts the hostility of local traders who accuse them of using unfair and illegal practices, and fuels the xenophobia that prevails in South Africa (Kadima, 2001: 105). In recent months some Somali have ventured out into townships to set up their businesses, only to be confronted by physical xenophobic attacks which destroyed their business premises, and some cases led to their homicide. The third broad category of immigration has been from the working and peasant classes of countries such as Senegal, Mali and Malawi. Here one needs to distinguish between the professional traders, whose informal trading is a network based on import-export business across the continent and globally, and those who are small traders but who sell goods on the street and fleamarkets, reliant on local wholesalers to purchase the goods they sell, in order to make a living. Both groups remit money in dollars, or euros (in the past, francs) to their families back home, and to their respective religious and ethno-national associations. As far as educational levels are concerned, this can range from university graduates and professionals to illiterate peasants who are sent by their families to earn money. Both these groupings are represented by the Senegalese, and to lesser extent the Malawians. For the ‘professional’ international street traders among the Senegalese they have an extended global network based on the Muslim Mouride brotherhood. These traders have a double status of being traders and international migrants (Bredeloup, 1995:21). The Senegalese single subsistence trader on the street also has access to the Mouride brotherhood, expressed through a community network known as the dahira, (or di’ira) and which in its local context, such as in Durban, Johannesburg, Port Elizabeth or Cape Town provides a place to meet, for prayer and the collections of funds to provide for emergency assistance to any member, and to remit funds for development projects back home. Amongst Malawians there are also those who seek and find formal employment in South Africa in vast range of occupations ranging from gardening to factory floor worker, from shop assistants to tailors and mechanics rather than as entrepreneurs.

The urban centres to which most African migrants gravitate to are not easy locations from which to make a living. It is a contested space, within which foreign migrants must also find a place to survive. The city centre, once the preserve of privileged white accommodation and economic opportunities, has changed dramatically. It now occupies the middle ground, a socio-spatial hierarchy that structures the life trajectories of different groups of people, between the townships and informal settlements on the one hand and the former white-only suburbs on the periphery on the other. The city centre in Durban is actively contested by new social forces of the post-apartheid period. On the one hand there is the Durban city council, keen to reverse inner city decline, pinning its hopes on urban renewal policies and strategies designed to target and attract affluent international consumption such as through the International Conference Centre, tourism, and the north pier and waterfront developments, and various affluent ‘gated communities’, while a large marginalised, but by no means exclusively black population, keen to pursue livelihood options in the city centre have become the new urban dwellers. It is into this contested terrain that foreign African migrants have found themselves. The city government and the older residents tend to consider foreign migrants, poor people and informal users of the city as illegitimate residents, unqualified to reside in a ‘modern’ urban environment and responsible for the grime and very high level of criminality. However, some of these migrants, such as the Malawians have abandoned this contested spatial terrain for residence and work on the periphery of the city, namely Mariannhill. It is just that those Malawians (though not all) who have removed themselves or absented themselves from those contestations have found another way of making a living: hidden, but not absent from developments in the city. On the other hand, Senegalese, and to a lesser extent the Somali, other Malawians (in common with Congolese and other continental African migrants) sought to refashion their strategies to make a living in the city centre.
The Senegalese and the Malawians illustrate very different options for survival, and reconstituting themselves as survivalist entrepreneurs, workers, family members and communities. Religion, per force, plays its role as a basis for social solidarity and welfare among Muslims from various particular countries, under circumstances that are difficult to negotiate. Virtually from the moment they arrive, they rely on their own networks and entrepreneurial experience to fend for themselves. While the Senegalese have opted to live and work in the city centre, the high cost of living in the city centre meant that many Malawian Muslim migrants exercised the option of moving their residence (and in some cases their enterprises) out of the city centre to the margins of the Durban Metro region such as in Mariannhill. In this sense their actions represent two very strikingly different responses to the vulnerable position that migrants find themselves in. Nevertheless, it also represents, in the case of the Senegalese and Malawians, very specific responses from within their respective social positions, particularly in the way religious affiliation is used as a resource - as spiritual and ideological sustenance, as well as strategic physical resource - in order for them to survive, and indeed prosper beyond merely survivalist livelihood strategies. It is to these issues that I now turn.

 NETWORKS, RELIGION AND LIVELIHOODS

One of the striking aspects of Malawian migrants is that despite the restrictions of Apartheid they have a long-established network of people that they can connect with when they arrive in Durban. The Senegalese on the other hand have a long experience of being international traders, no historical experience of migration to South Africa, but do have a model of networking that is quickly established and applied in the specific circumstances that exist. However, such resilience of these two archetypes depends on the kinds of resources or 'assets' that are available. As Moser (1996) has argued the more the resources or assets that the poor and marginalized have, the greater the chance of survival, persistence, resistance and recovery from poverty. One set of those resources are, in the case of migrants, their self defined networks of mutual assistance provided by such communities to those in need. There are limits to that assistance. The second set of resources are their identities which are closely tied up to the way the state recognises them, and the associated rights, or lack of such rights, and their reception and perceptions of themselves as belonging to a particular religion, nationality and sometimes race. The third set of resources or other assets is basic public infrastructure provided by the local state in which both the living and working conditions of migrants prevails. The combination and use of, or inability to use, available resources of Senegalese and Malawian Muslim migrants is explored below.

Before I continue to describe the networks and identities of the Senegalese and Malawians, I should define what networks are and how, in these cases, they link with the question of identity. Eades (1987:8) describes a network of migrants as a ‘spider’s web’, a veritable collection of connected people. Portes and Walton have described this circulation or network of migrants as a response to capitalist development as “tie-in groups distributed across different places maximising their economic opportunities through mutual aid and multiple displacements” (1981: 60) (my emphasis). When such linkages are maintained, renewed and reconstituted, whether through social ties and/or the passing of material goods from one locality in a nation state to another, identities are constructed and reappropriated through their daily practices to maximise their specific strategic intentions, whether these be in the context of families, organisations, economic activities, or business and financial investments (Basch, Schiller and Szanton-Blanc: 1994: 28-30). In applying these insights to the networks that Malawians and Senegalese have built up within South Africa, and Durban in particular, migrants’ networks should be seen as part of a process which constructs, reconstructs, and appropriates different aspects of their social relations, in order to insert themselves into the new local economy and society, and simultaneously retain contact with one or more places of origin. In other words they make the space for simultaneous living in two or more worlds in which their practices, social relations and multiple identities are embedded. One of the obvious outcomes of these networks or spider web connections is the multi-directional flow of ideas, information and events and the entrenching of migratory contacts, or transnational contacts and identities.

The Senegalese: Living and Trading in the City Centre

Most Senegalese, when they arrive make contact with fellow Senegalese. Once they register with the Department of Home Affairs, usually as asylum seekers, they begin the process of learning to trade on the street. If they do not have the start up capital, friends or relatives provide a small amount of start up capital for them to buy goods to sell on the streets, or share in some street enterprise before starting on their own. Sometimes the initial capital is made available through the Dahira organization. The critical point is to find a place to trade, avoid harassment by officials and the police, pay back the loan, accumulate and remit money and contribute to the Dahira. Many Senegalese, in the late 1990s and early 2000’s attempted but failed to obtain the license or permit to trade on the street. Some have been lucky enough obtain a trading stall at one of the permanent flea markets in the city centre. The flea markets are controlled by private entrepreneurs who rent out stalls or space to traders, making access to them outside the direct control of local government policy, by-laws or officials. Both Senegalese and Somalis have attempted to circumvent the permit system by using a proxy to apply for a license. Some have been successful and have employed their proxies, usually local women, as sales assistants. However, securing a permit through proxies does not end the harassment by the police and local government officials. Some local traders have alerted the authorities to those who have been able to obtain licenses in this way. This has been encouraged by the Durban Chamber of Commerce and Industry (Digest, October 1998). City police and inspectors have taken away their licenses on the grounds that they have been obtained fraudulently. This has forced most of the Senegalese to continue to trade illegally on the streets, particularly in central business districts. Since the late 1990s there has been constant pressure on the Senegalese, as well as other street traders to move their street business to less lucrative sites on the margins of the CBD. This policy of harassment is pursued with particular vigor and at times brutality. The problem with this approach is that while it plays into prejudices and racist attitudes of all sectors of the South Africa population, including those unreconstructed city planners, officials and politicians, it obscures several crucial issues concerning human rights and the development of the city.
Quite clearly having the right to seek and engage in meaningful employment whether as refugees or asylum seekers is being violated. While in purely technical terms to overcome this violation simply means an extension to legal immigrants the right to obtain a permit, the approach of the city to hawkers brings to light a broader set of development and governance issues. Immigrants live and work in the city. Their presence, both physically and socially, including the use of places of worship such as Mosques is unmistakable, and their use and contribution to the resources of the city makes it a concern for the city authorities. This should not be interpreted to mean that access to the city for African foreign migrants, but rather there should be recognition that such immigrants and migrants are not going to disappear. If indeed the local government deems it fit to cut off access by constant harassment of those street traders that seek to engage in legitimate and open informal business it can have the adverse effect of driving such business underground. This would add to the burden of crime rather than prevent it. Alternatively it would mean local government having to provide shelter, welfare services and some level of gainful employment. Thus far the city authorities have largely been reactive, and have left the provision of any services and assistance to refugees and political asylum seekers to non-governmental and religious organisations and private initiatives.

There are of course potential benefits to the city if a more constructive approach is taken to street trading by foreign nationals. Firstly, most of the Senegalese and the Somalis, and many local traders sell leather goods (bags, belts, shoes, watch straps) watches and clothing. These goods are obtained from a variety of sources, mainly from their own trade networks based in other major cities in South Africa, and from their contacts in Europe, America and Asia, and from local factories, local wholesalers or from foreign importers such as the Chinese who in turn import their goods from much the same sources. Given that we are living in a globally competitive environment, the networks and contacts of global trading established by the immigrants are a resource to be cultivated, rather than restricted. Further more, there are the trade networks that extend into Africa, albeit small by comparison with large multi-national companies, but nevertheless a point of departure for a port city to extend its trade network to an untapped market. Naturally this requires it to shed its Eurocentric vision of trade as primarily connected with Europe and America, and that small or micro enterprises are a matter of only an internal and tourist market. City authorities have largely been reactive to foreign migrants, rather than seeing an opportunity to use their presence to as part of revival and upgrading of the urban centre. Indeed it may be argued that by not recognising the potential revenue generated by granting immigrants the required trading permits, they reduce the revenue generated from immigrant street traders who are willing to pay these costs in order to secure a stand to support their business enterprises. City authorities have also left the burden of the provision of services and assistance to refugees and asylum seekers to non-governmental and religious organisations and private initiatives.

For migrants such as the Senegalese and Malawians the lack of state support structures has not prevented them from participating in the local economy. The Senegalese traders are known to be astute entrepreneurs who have been able to turn areas of other cities which have previously been thought to be dead into thriving markets. The distinctive entrepreneurship of the Senegalese lies in a number of factors. These are their reliance on their own internal network of local, national and international contacts to source the commodities they sell at the best possible prices, the ability to pool residential and household requirements, the absence of family structures, and a single minded dedication to the tasks. Their dedication to their entrepreneurial activities also draws from religion, that is, the interpretation of Islam by the Sufi saint Sheikh Ahmadou Bamba, which inculcates an ethic of resilience, frugality and honesty. It appears that their profit margins are made on their turnover, and not solely on a mercantile principle of buy cheap, sell competitively. From my observations they do not undercut the prevailing street prices of commodities. Hence, it is the skill of marketing entrepreneurship that is of vital importance in their successful business practice. However this presupposes a stable point on the street to build a client/customer base. Thus there was a great deal of frustration with the policy of the Durban city authorities which denies them trading permits and requires them to be constantly moving, thereby undermining their ability to do business. Indeed, their lack of economic rights (as an aspect of their human right to trade, occupation and profession) has forced them to seek legal advice. There were three options available: seek relief through direct legal action (a class action launched through the High Court) or negotiation with city officials and politicians over their plight. The Senegalese are more disposed to negotiation so that less unwanted political attention is drawn to themselves. This strategy will inevitably mean forming wider alliances and cooperation with other groups of migrants in similar situations, and organisations that deal with refugee issues, as well as local street traders organizations in an attempt to demonstrate to city officials that their concerns over their street trading rights affects a wider constituency than a specific foreign national group. A third option was to abandon trading on the streets, and either move into more formal trading patterns, or leave to other pastures. Many Senegalese chose to leave, while others continue to trade in flea market and establish formal retail businesses.

Malawians: Living on the Urban Periphery

Compare this set of circumstances with that of Malawians living on the urban periphery in an area known as Mariannhill, some 35 km from the centre of Durban. Some fifteen years ago Mariannhill was a peri-urban settlement (more rural and urban) of mixed races. It was an area where the really poor working class who could not afford a house in the urban townships lived along side small scale rural farmers, and consequently was a very underdeveloped area where many did not have basic essentials such as running water and electricity. Since 1994 it has seen the benefits of the Reconstruction and Development Programme (RDP) of the first post-apartheid government where land was bought from landlords, developed and given with freehold title to the occupants. This is the area that Malawians have begun to populate and live in since at least the 1990s.

These Malawians, as I have indicated above, occupy not just a different physical space in the city, but pursue a different way of participating and making a living in the city. Like the Senegalese they rely on their national identity to enter the country, the difference being that they are treated with less suspicion than other African nationals. They are aware that a declaration to an immigration official that they are seeking work in South Africa would be a tactical mistake. Thus obtaining a tourist visa is the least problematic means of entry because they can easily satisfy the test of a name and an address of a relative or friend in South Africa given the long term contact between the two countries. In any event Malawians are entitled, in terms of recent policy changes (not legislative) to admit people from within the Southern African Development Community (SADC) greater ease of access and residential rights to their respective countries. For example one Malawian informant showed me his resident permit and passport which was stamped: ‘Malawian citizen, resident in South Africa’. Unlike the Senegalese who rely heavily on their own internal network of Senegalese, the Dihira, for support, the Malawians rely on a variety of different strategies to survive. The fact of nationality is important for entry, (the long term relationships between the two countries and membership of the SADC) but once inside the country, religious community of Muslims, work skills, length of stay and marriage to locals are important considerations in their survivalist strategies.

Religious affiliation operates in two ways. Firstly, those Malawians living in Mariannhill are all Muslims, mostly Yao. Apart from the fact of being Malawian Muslims, they all live in a single neighbourhood, have their own Cheikh, mosque and madressa or Quranic school. There is a sense of co-operation and responsibility among the inhabitants, collectively known as the Greyville Muslim Association\(^{11}\) for receiving migrants from Malawi into their community. But primary responsibility lies with the migrant and his or her hosts to accommodate, provide initial sustenance, and direct the migrant to those who might assist in finding work. Secondly, Muslims in Malawi have established long term relationships with various local South African Islamic charity and welfare organisations that have been operating in Malawi. In the main these organisations are mostly based in Durban, such as the International Dawa Movement and the International Islamic Propagation Centre, which are supported by local Indian South African Muslims. These contacts are reciprocated when Malawians come to Durban. For example when one of the few woman Malawian migrants, Kiri Banda, said that one of the reasons she was able to come to Durban was because she had the address of a Muslim Indian woman who had engaged in Islamic missionary work in Malawi, and was able to stay with her until she was able to fend for herself. The missionary apparently had worked for Islamic Propagation Centre\(^{12}\). She also had the address of her brother, but did not reside with him initially (interview, 27 July 1999). The second example is when a Sudanese-trained Islamic scholar, Said Muhammad, came to Durban to minister to the needs of Malawian Muslims. He was employed by the International Dawah Movement, also based in Durban, as a religious teacher and leader among the Malawians of Mariannhill on the grounds. As stated by Said Muhammad, “Malawians [in Durban] had limited knowledge of Islam. The response was very good. Malawians began to learn new aspects of Islam.” He then began to convert many of the ‘Zulu’ in Mariannhill (Interview 8 July 1999). His employment as a religious teacher was prompted by the intervention of another Malawian who had migrated to South Africa in 1945, Moses Chindu, and who had close a relationship with Dr Dadoo, an official of the International Dawah Movement. This served as the basis of his considerable community involvement, and network of friends and contacts, not only in religious matters, but also in community matters such as providing literacy classes for the youth and the translation of religious texts from English to Zulu (a language which he also learnt very quickly to enable him to proselytise among the Zulu speakers of the community)\(^{13}\). The irony of a Malawian conducting proselytizing activities in South Africa, where local, mostly Indian Muslim organizations have failed, is not new. An early link between Malawians and Islam religious practices can also be seen in the proselytising activities of one Malawian migrant, Sheikh Abbas Phiri, who in the 1940s came to work on the coal mines of KwaZulu-Natal. He also worked on the sugar plantations and on a fishing trawler. When he retired from his formal occupation in the early 1970s, he began his proselytising activities in the township of Inanda, north of Durban. Phiri had received a formal Islamic education in Malawi, that is, his father forbade him to receive a modern western education on the grounds that it would make him lose his Islamic faith, or worse turn him into a Christian. When he came to South Africa, Phiri married a local woman, but unlike the Zanzibaris with whom he lived for a while on the Bluff (at King’s Rest), he set up home in the peri-urban area of Inanda. It was from his home that he began to convert the local population to Islam with the assistance of the mainly Indian, though politically left leaning, Muslim Youth Movement. Although there is a close identification of Islam with Indians, these proselytising activities began to shift the identifiers, eventually resulting in Sheikh Phiri’s son becoming the Imam (religious leader) of the small black Muslim community in another nearby black township of KwaMashu (Vawda, 1994).

What these examples suggests is that the decision to migrate, apart from the sense that prosperity exists in South Africa, is informed for Malawian migrants by the notion of the Umma – that a community of Muslims exists in South Africa, thus triggering actual migration. For example S. Banda who found himself in dire financial straits in Malawi decides to migrate, with a companion, to find work to feed his family. He states.

I had no plan to come to any person. I am a Muslim and I was going to rely on other Muslims to assist me. After I got off the taxi at Umgeni Road, I saw a Mosque [the May Street Mosque]. It was Esha time [the evening prayer]. I saw some people coming out of the Mosque. I simply went to them and greet them ‘As salaam wa alakum’. They had to respond. I asked them to tell me where 155 Grey Street was [the Grey Street Mosque]. Someone took me there. …This was the only address I had. I met an old man there who was from Malawi. He worked in the Mosque. He helped the two of us. (Interview, May 1999)

It is in the context of these contacts that the Malawian immigrants are able to find assistance and work from among the local Muslim community. Work opportunities range from casual unskilled jobs to regular fixed salary work as machinists, tailors, shop assistants and domestic servants. As Shafik, a Malawian Muslim said “As Muslims they give us work, but they also don’t pay well. We must thank Allah they give us the chance to get some money, but it is too little”. However, another Malawian, Sarah, qualified this by stating that even if wages are low by South African standards, it is much more than they would earn in Malawi. For example, a recent migrant of three weeks, Jimo, said that it took him three months to earn enough money, $75, just to enable him to travel from Malawi to South Africa. Even under exploitative conditions such as for domestic servants it would take less than two months to earn that amount in South Africa.

But it is the possibility of living in the urban periphery, with lower accommodation and subsistence costs and with a community support system that enables them to survive on very low wages. But for them it is not just another poverty trap. Like the Senegalese who are able to survive on very small profit margins because they live communally in run down city centre apartments, surviving in the semi-urban area of Marainnhill enables them to accumulate some surplus funds over a two or three year period. The question is what do they do with these accumulated funds? In the case of one of my key informants Shafik, set up his own tailoring business in Marainnhill, after many years of working in a clothing factory and various tailoring establishments. Working from home he was able to accept contract work from some of the Indian owned clothing factories and retailers, as well as casual everyday business. Another, Kenneth and his friend Ebrahim sew pinafores for sale to local women street traders. Other Malawian migrants, it seems, buy various goods that are scare in Malawi: clothes, electronic equipment, household equipment, cosmetics etc for re-sale in Malawi. Others, such as the recent migrant, Jimo, are here as target workers. They have in their minds what they want to pursue as their main subsistence or livelihood activities in Malawi, but need to obtain the necessary start up capital or commodities by working in South Africa, and then returning. Thus for some the whole process of migration, work, accumulation and return could be repeated as need arises leading to a pattern of oscillating international migration between their countries of origin and South Africa.

These case studies suggest that for African Muslim migrants, particularly the Senegalese and Malawians, that while they are economic migrants, asylum seekers and refugees, who retain contact with their countries of origin, and may wish to return home, they are also a set of diverse inhabitants of the city with a diverse set of expectations in terms of access to resources, jobs, services and rights. Despite being victims of migratory processes and xenophobia, they have developed a creative network of people and incipient associations, based on their religious and ethno-national characteristics as is normal for such migrants’ worldwide, and upon which they rely on to make a living and assimilate themselves into the host society and economy. Their ability to find ways of making it possible to survive and many cases prosper in social and economic terms, presumes some level of organizational initiatives, and opens the way for its development.
There are a number of issues which these Muslim migrants’ social and economic practices raise, which are discussed below.

COMMENTARY

Organizational development
When comparing the two Muslim migrant communities and the role of religion in their livelihood strategies, it is quite clear that Islam is worn on the sleeves of the Malawians out in Marainnhill, and is clearly demonstrated in the building of a mosque and madressa.
Although the Senegalese do not outwardly display the trappings of their religion, this does not mean that they do not practice their religion. Their practice, such as in praying is not apparent because many of them prefer to pray in the safety of their apartments, rather than attend the mosques which then openly invites prejudiced comments from black South Africans, who still associate Islam with an ‘Indian religion’. However, Malawians have used their religious activism and contacts among local Muslims to access assistance upon arrival, employment opportunities and as benefactors to build mosques such as the one in Marianhill, as well as the donation of land for residential purposes. The price for such close association may well be dependence on patronage. The Senegalese on the other hand have not taken this route, relying rather on their own resources to provide for themselves through their street and other trading activities. Senegalese resources are not just material and financial ones, but the considerable wider network of national and international links that they have in Africa, Europe and America through their mutual aid society Dahira Mafathihul Bischri. In recent times the Senegalese have made contact with local Muslim organizations, primarily to find suitable sites to host heir annual Magal ritual celebrations. However, this was on the terms that they would pay for the services rendered by the local Muslim organizations, rather than patronage. In some ways the separate organisational structures that the Malawians and Senegalese have evolved, chooses research in Europe which shows the ethno-national origins and character of Muslim organizations (Buijs and Rath, 2006: 15).

Identities: State, Place and Prejudice
While there are organizational developments taking place which suggest a certain permanency of continental African, and particularly Muslim presence, the very process of migrating, and the retention of ties back home (so to speak) means that new identities had to be forged. Foreign migrant identities are shaped from the moment they arrive at border posts. From the perspective of the foreign migrant state power is visibly apparent in the whole apparatus of borders, passport controls, issuing of visas, permits and rights and obligations attached to it. The local state on the other hand has reacted in mainly negative and hostile ways in the contestation for urban space to work and live, or alternatively trying to ignore that they exist. However, identities are also powerfully shared by those that they interact with, in this case principally their co-religionists and the local populations. These are analysed below.

Place and identity
There are different aspects to the notion of place. In the context of pursuing livelihood strategies place of origin, place of destination and use of identity and networks in these places are important to consider. Like most continental Africans such as the Senegalese (and others from Congo, Nigeria, etc) they rely on their national identity to enter the country, the difference being that they, the Malawians, are treated with less suspicion than other African nationals. Secondly, while many Senegalese claim asylum status, Malawians cannot make this claim. Asylum seekers and refugees have a certain ease of entry, and unlike in other African countries have freedom of movement to find work as they are not confined to refugee camps. In any event Malawians are entitled to visitor entries, which are easier to obtain in terms of recent policy changes (not legislative) to admit people from within the Southern African Development Community (SADC) with greater ease of access and residential rights to their respective countries. As Said Muhammad stated in recounting his experience at the Zimbabwe-South Africa border:
The treatment at the border was very good. There is only one condition: do not say you are coming to look for work. Say you are visiting. You see, in the SADC non-citizens like Malawians have special permission to live here. You can even get an identity book, but you are a non-citizen.
What is clear is that migrants, whatever their own or other southern African countries currently offer in the form of livelihood possibilities, see South Africa as the best possible destination. Yet entry as a national of another country does not imply that every migrant wants to settle here permanently. Clearly some do, but retain their ties to their places of origin, and intend, at some future and unspecified time, return to their home – the village, town or city of their country of origin. But they still hold the option of coming back as migrants to seek work for specific purposes – accumulate capital, buy goods for trading or to support a family or business enterprise in Malawi. Official national status, the country of origin, becomes another means to access other livelihood possibilities in other SADC countries, but principally South Africa. These Muslim African migrants are transnational migrants.

Upon entry different identities are adopted in relation to the place of accommodation and work. The fact of nationality is important for entry (the long-term relationships between the two countries and membership of the SADC), but once inside the country, religious affiliation, village or town of origin, work skills, length of stay, and marriage to locals are important considerations in their survivalist strategies. Consideration shall be given to these other identities, especially religion and skills as part of their livelihood strategies below. What is important to highlight here is the fact that many Malawians opt to live in a relatively underdeveloped part of the city. Unlike the Senegalese (and other migrants such as the Somali, Nigerians, Congolese, Burundians and Rwandans) whose livelihoods are integrally bound to the centre of the city, the Malawians who live in Mariannhill do not just occupy a different physical space in the city, but pursue a different way of participating and making a living in the city. Being physically far from the city centre gives them a level of protection from constant raids from the police and home affairs officials, as well as enabling a most modest standard of living. Furthermore there is a sense of community that has developed among the Malawians, as is evidenced by the building of two mosques and a madressa (an Islamic school) to educate children and adults about Islam, and a network of contacts allowing for a flow of information that enables Malawians to access jobs and economic opportunities. However, unlike the Senegalese who rely heavily on their own internal network, the Dahira, for support, and to which they contribute financially the Malawian networks are less formally organised. They do rely on their networks, particularly as points of contact when they first enter the country and to access their first jobs, but they also pursue livelihood strategies without their networks. However it should be noted that not all Malawians pursue this strategy of place and identity, such as Mariannhill, national of Malawi, native of Mangochi district, and/or Muslim, or friend and relative from town of village of origin, as the only means of entry and survival as foreign migrants. A significant number do live in areas such as Overport, a high-density residential area of mainly high-rise apartment blocks and the city centre. Whereas Senegalese are conspicuous, at least initially, by their inability to communicate in either English or one of the local indigenous languages, Malawians speak English, and make the effort to learn Zulu, which allows for a level of integration within the community or residential area of occupation, and easier working relationships with local people.

Interactions with Non-Muslims Coping with Prejudice

It has been well documented that continental Africans are often surprised at the xenophobic and racist vitriol directed at them by South Africans, particularly black people. The most common term used by black South African for continental Africans is ‘amakwerekwere’ – reference to the apparently unintelligible languages that they speak. Apart from verbal abuse, they are often accused of stealing jobs, a drain on the resources of the country and taking the local women, as well as being involved in crime and drugs. Some migrant national groups such as the Nigerians and Congolese have reacted to such prejudices by defending their national identity, thus reinforcing a cycle of boundary maintenance, stereotyping, and promoting scapegoating, among South Africans in a context of sluggish economic growth and high unemployment (Morris, 2001: 75-8). Although unemployment and moderate growing economy combined with effects of isolation from the rest of the continent have contributed to a less than adequate response by local people to the problems of other Africans, what is interesting about the Malawian and Senegalese responses to xenophobic and racist verbal abuse is that it has not led to an intensification of nationalism, as is the case with the Nigerians and Congolese, but rather placing the accent on religious and ethnic identities. Malawians and Senegalese while they do experience xenophobia and racism, have developed a different approach to dealing with such prejudices. In the main it has been less openly hostile, and more cautious. As Said Muhammad, a man of measured words, said of South Africans:

I will never forget this country when I go. Generally the people in South Africa are good people. But sometimes they call us kwerekwere. But mostly they are good people (29 July 2001)

Working and trading with South Africans

This generosity towards South Africans by migrants such as the Malawians must be placed in the context of their participation and contributions to the economy and society of South Africa. In a study done by Rogerson of immigrant entrepreneurs (i.e. informal traders) in Johannesburg in 1996-97 it was found that they contributed ‘to the revitalisation of the declining economy of the city centre’ and consider Johannesburg a city ‘full of opportunities and appropriate for doing business’ (Rogerson, 1997: 9). It would be similar for other urban centers as well. Apart from internal trading there is also the consideration of cross border trade and remittances to their home country. Depending on their work situation and income earned nearly all migrants send remittances back home. Contrary to popular perception this is not a removal of a substantial portion of income and hence vast sums of foreign exchange from the economy. One main reason for sending remittances is to support a family back home, but other reasons are to raise sufficient capital to start their own enterprises in their own countries, thus expanding international trade. The cross border trade in fact supports the manufacturing sector of the economy. Many either bring money to invest, to buy or to sell arts and craft goods in South Africa, and in turn use the money earned to buy South African manufactured goods to sell in their respective countries. Contrary to popular belief, most migrants are not a drain on society. Thus not only do foreign migrants support themselves, thus mitigating the alleged drain on South Africa, but many such traders or entrepreneurs on the street actually employ some local people. Further more, working and learning different skills also enables them put into practice these skills in their own country.

Rights to trade and live

As stated above local authorities such as Durban have largely reacted to foreign migrants, usually in hostile and negative ways, often on the assumption that foreigners are to blame for a range of inner city problems. Thus, by extension, foreign migrants are an irritant to be ignored and excluded from developmental plans of the local state, and therefore marginalized. However inappropriate the local state authorities responses might be presently, it cannot be assumed that in the future such authorities would want to exclude migrants in some kind of formal local enfranchisement process. There are three reasons why this is an important consideration. Firstly, migrants such as the Malawians and Senegalese particularly those who have been here for long period of time and who have married locally can claim residential rights. In both the cases of the Senegalese and Malawians there are those, who despite the problems of xenophobia, hostility and intolerance, and associated problems of finding employment and living spaces, are beginning to see their stay in South Africa as more long term, perhaps even permanent rather than transitory, short term, or temporary and is evidenced in the case of the Senegalese by the purchase of a house to establish a permanent base for the dihira, and the beginning of establishing formal business premises. Some Malawians, such as those on in the outskirts of the city, have benefited from local government development initiatives. They cannot simply be excluded from local decision-making processes. Secondly, the Muslim Malawians have also benefited from their close associations with other powerful segments of the local population such as the local Muslim welfare agencies and business elites to access employment opportunities and as benefactors for mosques built in Mariannhill. The building of the mosques and the provision of religious instructors have led to greater stability within the Malawian community. Although the price to be paid for this may be dependency on patronage of the Muslim elites in the city centre in the future, the process of entwining Malawian migrants to the local business sector cannot simply be undone or ignored. Thirdly, all Malawian and Senegalese (as well as other foreign African migrants) in Durban, who have some stake in the economy, either as employees or as self-employed small scale entrepreneurs, might wish to be included in some form of local representation as to their economic rights. Furthermore, there are the trade networks that extend into Africa, albeit small by comparison with large multi-national companies, but nevertheless a point of departure for any city to extend its trade network into an undertapped market. But a wider vision of developing trade networks through small scale enterprises assumes that foreign migrants would want to be included in some form of representation, particularly as to their economic rights to work either as employees or as self-employed small-scale entrepreneurs. For the city to acknowledge the growth and development potential that lies locked by discriminatory practices against foreign small-scale entrepreneurs means to confront the question of rights of foreign migrants, and their incorporation in the governance of the city.

Diversity and Tolerance

I mentioned above that African Muslims undermine the notion of Islam and Muslim as a racial stereotype. This is important in that it does confirm the idea of toleration of a diversity of religious beliefs and practices. But more important than simply undermining received notions of racial stereotypes, the very existence of a plurality of African Muslims prompts a debate about the nature of multiculturalism in South Africa and what statutory bodies do to promote tolerance and respect for diversity and stop the spreading of xenophobia and non-institutionalized racism. However, the question of African Muslim migrants’ susceptibility to xenophobic attacks does raise critical questions about defining political equality in terms of individual or groups rights. Should the state give unqualified support for the protection of minorities? Or uncritical support to the spreading of religious dogma? How does one define who is a Muslim, or belonging to a Muslim community? How can diversity or pluralism be compatible with liberal individualism? Although there is weak understanding of group rights in the South African constitution, the general view is that political equality to practice ones cultural tenets is defined as an individual right. This may not be the view held by certain religious leaders, and that the relationship between community needs and the individual may need to explored and re-thought. Thus the presence of foreign African Muslims raises many more issues of great complexity than simply their presence.

CONCLUSIONS

The Malawians and Senegalese present a picture of industrious petty entrepreneurs and workers engaged in a diverse set of occupations. While the Muslim Malawians are removed from the everyday contestation of physical space in the city centre both with other street traders, city officials and the police, these are precisely the issues and problems that plagued the Senegalese. This in turn prompted many Senegalese to return home, or find new ways of coping with the discrimination and prejudices. While entry into South African seems almost unproblematic, it is through the use of their networks, that entry into the local economy is realised, and depending on the opportunities presented, making good their original objectives in migrating to Durban, albeit making the necessary tactical changes in the situations they find themselves. But they do face problems with xenophobia and racism being among the most important. These prejudices directed at them do impact on the way they operate in securing for themselves accommodation, livelihoods and the practice of being Muslims. In their several other identities as Muslims, traders, employers, employees and residents they play profoundly different roles as they begin to contest their all-consuming subjected identity.

It is evident that African migrants arrive in the city with hardly a clear idea of what it is they are going to do to make a living, except that somehow it must be better than what they left behind. Yet at the same time they try to make sense of their new environment. Religion certainly plays a role in coming to terms with their new environment, but in making sense and creating a new everyday practice of a living in the city within a highly differentiated urban population, incoming migrants appropriate it and change it, they bring new vitality to urban existence and pose new challenges to local and city authorities in spheres such as providing services, housing, employment, markets and other public spaces. A very crucial way in which public spaces are challenged is the valorisation of their belief systems and religious practices. And in doing so, also challenge the rhetoric that the city is a place of inclusiveness.
There was a debate on the numbers of illegal or undocumented migrants in South Africa. Some ‘researchers’ presented grossly inflated figures to indicate that almost of half the current South African population were made of illegal or undocumented migrants. This debate was finally settled when the Human Sciences Research Council stated in 2002 that it was all but impossible to give any precise figures for undocumented migrants. This is not to say there are no undocumented or illegal migrants.

One has to be careful in using this method of estimating where Muslims migrants. It may be assumed that a person from Sudan or Somalia is a Muslim, but in fact may be non-Muslims refugee or political asylum seeker.

Most immigrants who have applied for a permit to trade in the streets in their individual capacities or though proxies have not been successful.

One informant refers in self-depecating way to himself and his fellow Senegalese as “…black and ugly. It is easy to see who we are”

One such initiative is sponsored by the Japanese Voluntary Service, and another by the Catholic Church.

Most married Senegalese migrants do not have their wives with them.

The land on which the Malawians lived was apparently owned by an Indian Muslim, a Mr Moola, who according to my informants donated the land to be developed. The land was taken over by the Inner West Council of the Durban Metro and developed with Reconstruction and Development Programme funds. The land was cut up into residential plots and freehold title was given to the residents. Water and electricity was also supplied, and roads laid out.

I do not want to exaggerate this sense of community because at the moment they are a community in a religious sense. This takes on a significant meaning when everyone else around them is either Hindu or Christian. Further more they often express the need to organise themselves to petition the local council for facilities such as a clinic and crèche, and to assist new immigrants.

The Islamic Propagation Centre is based in Durban and apparently carries out missionary work in various parts of Southern Africa.

This also provided the good Sheikh with the possibility of engaging in some entrepreneurial activities of his own, unrelated to his religious leadership, and remitting funds to start businesses in Malawi.
